Over the last few decades, there has been a drive to encourage students to continue their studies at university. Efforts have been made to increase the capacity of universities and schools often believe that the more students they prepare for university, the better (introduction (topic).

I don't believe this is necessarily a good thing (point of view). For some students, university is a stepping stone to the ultimate goal of a career. For others, the choice will be work that requires practical expertise rather than academic abilities and they will not need to go to university to achieve this (reasons for point of view).

The challenge for schools is to strike the right balance between academic study and preparing young people (or employment (main idea – role of schools). The ultimate aim of education is to ensure the population has an adequate level of skill sets and that individuals are capable of being effective in the workplace (main idea – aim of education) . Schools should be focusing on making sure students are able to communicate well. are numerate, have a foundation of general knowledge and an ability to find things out for themselves (examples to support main idea).

In my view. communication is the most important of these skills (main idea – communication). Being able to write an essay, report or email. and being able to speak clearly and coherently are essential both for employment and for university study (examples to support main idea). At my university. students who cannot express themselves well in writing find it hard to do their assignments and this causes them a lot of anxiety (personal experience).

To conclude, I believe schools should keep to their primary function of teaching the core skills I have outlined above (point of view). If they do this. they should succeed in preparing their students for life after school – whether it be at university or in the world of work (summing up of point of view).

As medical care improves and the life expectancy of men and women increases, there are a number of consequences that will arise for future generations. Some of these will be beneficial, but some could cause issues. (introduction to topic).

Most people would like to live longer, provided they can maintain a good quality of life (positive development – main idea) . This requires good health, money and the desire to participate in an active lifestyle (explanation of (main idea)). Some elderly people have had the opportunity through their working life to save for their retirement, while others may be fit, healthy and enthusiastic about working well into their sixties or seventies {support (or main idea)}. For all these people, living longer is likely to be a positive experience (summing up of (positive development)).

However, there are other elderly people who have not been able to provide for their old age or who, despite improved medical care, struggle to lead a healthy life (disadvantage (or individual- nwin idea)). My grandfather, for example, was a builder all his life. He never managed to save for his retirement and, despite medication to stabilize his health problems, he is unable to continue working (example – main idea). For him, old age is a constant worry.

As far as society is concerned, another negative consequence of people living longer is the effect this could have on the workplace {disadvantage (or society – main idea)}. Currently, most people retire in their sixties and this allows the younger generation to move into the jobs they have left. As people stay on at work, the turnover of jobs declines making it more difficult for younger people to get work {explanation of (disadvantage (or Society))}.

On balance, I believe that improving medical care in order to extend life expectancy is a good thing (point of (view)). However, governments must ensure that young people are not deprived of jobs and that old people who cannot support themselves are well looked after. (summary of (main ideas)).
